MAKING CONNECTIONS is an innovative and insightful book about teaching at a distance and using technology to deliver instruction. In it, instructors find many exciting tips and practical ideas for making distance education personable, engaging and effective. In short, this concise book helps instructors connect with distant learners. The techniques and strategies provided are indispensable and can be put to work immediately to improve distance teaching efforts.

Anyone who will be or who is already teaching at a distance should read this practical guide about how to plan, create and deliver distance education programs and courses. Both research and practice have contributed to the "how to's," and are discussed in two parts. Part I describes the five basic design components of successful programs and includes a checklist to guide planning before, during and after courses. Part II provides an overview of the underlying theory and research as well as a glossary of distance education terms.
